My Education

My education is important to me for many reasons. Like all things, there's a good and bad side. With your education, it helps express both sides, not just the good. It sets you up for life by teaching you to read, write, and learn to open your mind to new things. At the same time it teaches you what you can and can't do, it teaches you the limit and how to break it within the boundaries of today's society and so on into the future.

My education is not just about learning, it's about the goals both I and others set for me in order to accomplish new things and new ideas. One of the biggest parts of my education is the people I see as role models. Sure, they may not all be the same but they are important. They set a goal for you to beat, to one day be like them or even greater. For me my role model is my ELA teacher. One day I hope to be a teacher that helps when you need it and inspires you to the limit. Someday I hope to be like her, maybe even greater.

I've struggled with my education my whole life. Some subjects are worse than others, but the subject I've struggled with the most has to be writing. I used to despise writing. I would do anything to get out of an essay or summary because I couldn't think of anything. I would look at the paper and just get stuck. But then my ELA teacher saw me struggle and helped me discover that I'm pretty good at writing. I am thankful for teachers like these that open my mind up to a new world

That was just an example of how much I appreciate the education system. Without the education system I wouldn't be this far in life. I wouldn't even be typing this essay today. Then again, without education our world would be in havoc and we would not be able to read nor write. That is why I'm so grateful for my education.
